Michiel Matthes prepared this programme based on documentation provided by Ruth Churchill Dower and Iina Berden.

1. Introduction

This Qoc Talk is a follow-up to the talk with Dr. Eeva Anttila on 5 September 2017 on 'Art education promotes the development of the child and society'. Meanwhile Eeva Anttila wrote a chapter for the book 'Improving the Quality of Childhood in Europe, Volume 7', to be published this autumn, and I take over from her text the following section, because it is a good introduction to the theme of this session:

"In order to advocate and justify arts education for all, we need to be able to articulate the distinctive nature of aesthetic experience and artistic activity. Liora Bresler, a specialist in music education, put the question in the following way:

Earlier in my enculturation as a musician, the dominant question revolved around "what is good art". It was later, with my increasing fascination with the educational powers of the arts, that I became intrigued by the question of "what is art good for".

In other words, we need to better understand how the arts engage, affect and transform human beings. I will now try to substantiate my view with theories and research on the significance of the arts for the development of the child and society. However, it is pertinent to state first that the right to the arts and culture is widely recognized in international human rights agreements, and that in these treaties, arts and culture are mentioned as concepts which have intrinsic value. They are perceived as phenomena of human life that are vital to civilization and to democracy. Thus, the educational value of the arts should not be questioned. It seems clear that in today's educational policy world the intrinsic value of the arts is not understood and that policy makers increasingly look for extrinsic values, that yield economical profits. This divide between intrinsic and extrinsic value may be at the core of the problem (.....).

In her book, "Not for profit" the human rights philosopher Martha C. Nussbaum (2010) speaks for the value of art to human beings and societies. According to her, the study of humanities and the arts teaches respect of and consideration for other people, which are required by democracy. The arts support the growth of tolerant and understanding citizens and challenge prejudices and stereotypes. The spirit of the arts and humanities includes critical thought, daring imagination, empathetic understanding of human experiences of many different kinds, and understanding of the complexity of the world in which we live. Nussbaum warns that the reduction in the teaching of humanities and the arts at schools due to their low potential to generate economic value for the society threatens the future of democratic nations. " (Eeva Anttila, in press).

2. The Case study of the UK: Arts and Creativity in early years education

According to international experts in business, academia and industry, creativity is one of the most important characteristics of a thriving organisation and a competent, motivated community of workers. Yet this is still the one aspect of early education that seems to be the hardest to facilitate, teach, model, observe and measure successfully. The reasons could be to do with a misunderstanding of what creativity means, what it looks like in practice, how to help spot, progress and measure its qualities, and how to harness it at different developmental stages in all young children. Ultimately, educators who lack confidence in their own artistic ability, and its associations with fashioning a product rather than enjoying a process, are amongst those who feel the most challenged in bringing out children's innate creative capabilities. This presentation will explore what art and creativity means and how it is relevant for the world of early education where children's minds are wide open to possibility. The speaker will identify in what ways creativity helps each area of a child's learning and development, how creativity can be released through different art forms, how it can be nurtured and taught successfully by both educators and parents and, ultimately, how we can discover and release our own, inner creativity.

3. The Case Study of Finland: Finland's ambition to ensure every child's participation in cultural life

Iina Berden's presentation will draw a picture of the Finnish art education system ensuring every child's participation in cultural life and the topical issues in the policies of the Ministry of Education and Culture. The Finnish system is based on basic art education institutions, children's cultural centres, school's art education and the work of art and cultural heritage organisations. Every child's right to find, experience and make art and culture is the priority in Finnish cultural policy. In this task, the schools have a unique role. The government has a special investment project focusing on the art education given by cultural professionals in primary and secondary schools in early afternoons. This project, as well as many other actions in Finland, are nowadays more and more based on children's and young people's hearing, their interests in different fields of art and participation. In the Ministry of Education and Culture they are looking for new ways to inspire children and young people and to strengthen the links between research and organisations working with the children. The presentation will give several examples how this is done and what the findings are.

7. Overall objectives of the QoC Talks:

- To gain a better understanding of the Quality of Childhood in the EU Member States. This time we will focus on 'The Importance of Art in Childhood, Case Studies from the UK and Finland'.
- To reflect on the role that the European institutions can play to improve the situation.
- To get to grips with the values, principles and approaches that could lead to improvements for children both in Europe and around the world.
- To form an effective working group and to get a sense of how to move on.

I take pleasure in inviting you for the 70th session on 4 September 2018.

With best regards,

Michiel Matthes
Chairman
Alliance for Childhood European Network Group
